

February 15, 2005

Federal Communications Corporation
Washington, D.C.

Re: Indiana's Do Not Call List

Dear Sirs:

I am a subscriber to Indiana's Do Not Call List and am very happy with the way it works. I am not interrupted during dinner or family time with unwanted calls from people trying to sell me something that I do not want.

It disgusts me that the Indiana CBA is trying to fight this law. Why should the people of Indiana be bothered in their private residences with nuisance phone calls? I think that the people of the Indiana CBA should publish their own private home telephone numbers to all of their customers so that we can call them and complain about the service in their respective banks. Why do they really want to fight this law? Why can't they just leave their customers alone and understand that if we want additional services with them, we'll come to our nearest branch and get the information?

I have spoken with several friends and family members and they do not want this law diminished. They want the law to remain as it stands and have the right to not be disturbed in our own homes. If there is something on TV that offends us, we can change the channel or simply turn the TV off. You can't do that with the telephone. A home telephone is a personal line of communication that each individual person should be able to use as they wish. We should not have to cringe each time it rings wondering who is trying to sell me something now.

Please convey this message to the Indiana CBA – we do not want to be disturbed!!!

Thank you,

Karen Moore